Dear Sophie Castle,

I'm applying for the role of Editorial Manager of the Museum Publishing Programme because it brings together the two areas of my work – editorial work for cultural publishers and consultancy work with museums – into a single position. I'd recently bought the Thames & Hudson book on Walker Evans by David Company and thought it was exceptional, which led me to look into the possibility of working for you. I was delighted to find the opening listed on your Careers page.

I moved back to London at the start of 2026 having lived and worked in Barcelona for five years. Throughout that time I've worked freelance, editing a range of illustrated art and design books, magazines, and digital projects. In more recent years I've taken on editorial and strategic consultancy work for museums and other large creative organisations, including the Guggenheim Bilbao. I'm now at a point in my career where I would like to bring this expertise together and commit my full attention to a single publisher.

The freelance nature of my work has required me to manage multiple complex projects simultaneously, working across editorial and production processes. For the past three years I have had full responsibility for the budget and schedule of Real Review, as well as commissioning illustrated articles and working closely with contributors to develop them. Copyediting and proofreading remain part of my work, though I spent considerably more time on both as a junior editor. My projects have naturally led me to manage the people involved: designers and junior editors, external – often high-profile – contributors and their agents, the printers, distributors, and so on. Collaborating across this range is what I find most rewarding about my work.

My consultancy experience has given me a thorough understanding of how museums operate and how to work effectively within them. I've worked with staff across departments, presenting, running workshops, and interviewing individuals, always with the aim of aligning around a shared vision. I have excellent rapport with my clients and colleagues, and bring a positive, forward-moving energy to everything I do. I believe my combination of publisher-side editorial work and museum-side understanding is what this role requires.

Thames & Hudson's books have been a benchmark for quality throughout my editorial career. I studied architecture at university and have since built a thorough knowledge of art and design history, commissioning and writing on these subjects for various publications. It is my passion as well as my vocation, and I would love to bring that enthusiasm to Thames & Hudson and its museum partners.

Thank you for taking the time to read my application. I look forward to discussing my suitability for the role further.

Yours sincerely,
